Jordan's Principle

<https://sac-isc.gc.ca/eng/1568396042341/1568396159824>

Jordan's Principle is a legal principle in Canada that ensures First Nations children have access to the same level of government-funded services as all other children in Canada. Jordan's Principle states that when a government agency determines that a First Nations child requires service, that service should be provided, regardless of whether the child's band or the government agency is ultimately responsible for paying for it. The principle is intended to ensure that First Nations children are not disadvantaged because of their identity or the jurisdictional complexities that can arise in providing services to them.

Jordan's Principle is a principle that ensures there is a substantive equality and that there are no gaps in publicly-funded health, social and education programs, services and supports for First Nations children.
